						Author doesn't follow the Supreme Court Database's rules for issue areas: "This variable identifies the issue for each decision. Although criteria for the identification of issues are hard to articulate, the focus here is on the subject matter of the controversy rather than its legal basis." The documentation goes on: "The objective is to categorize the case from a public policy standpoint..."

MASSACHUSETTS v. OAKES	491 U.S. 576	JPStevens	Pro-Speech	Liberal	Conservative	Author doesn't challenge

The newspaper has liberal roots, so the author thinks it should be liberal speech. But the issue at hand was revealing the identity of a victim of sexual assault. Keeping that information private is more of a liberal interest, so the speech is coded as conservative. Again, the author is confusing the broader beliefs of the speaker with the specific speech itself.

Dawson was a prisoner and white supremacist and so the author says it should be liberal because Dawson is a prisoner. Just because all conservatives don't agree with the speech doesn't make it more liberal.

This is commercial speech, and regulating commercial speech in the name of preventing fraud is a liberal cause, so it's coded as conservative speech. The author cites decisions to code the advertisements of personal injury attorneys and foreclosure attorneys as liberal. But the restrictions here weren't about preventing fraud (as admitted by the regulators in both cases), and the speech in question was targeted at disadvantaged groups and so coded as liberal.

See under row 4368. A challenge to the party establishment to offer more inclusion in the nomination process and on the ballots – this is a liberal motivation regardless of which party is being challenged. The author is conflating partisanship and ideology. Although they are linked, they are not identical in our coding.
